

Home Schooling Missionary Kids

You can provide significant help to missionaries in rural areas by assisting them in teaching their children. By serving as a home-school teacher you can free a missionary to focus on language study or other ministries while you experience the mission field first-hand.

Many missionaries, particularly in rural areas, do not have access to educational facilities for their children and do not want to send them to boarding school. Home-schooling their children can help them stay together as a family and make a significant contribution to world mission. You don't need any specialised training for this role, although teacher training, teaching Sunday school or working in children's programs would be helpful and of course a love for children is essential!

You will supervise the children's lessons in their home using the lesson material provided and you can have an impact in children's lives as you build relationships with them inside and outside the classroom. There is also plenty of scope for other ministry within the community or local church.

If you love teaching kids and are ready for an adventure of a lifetime, one of these positions may be for you!

Ethiopia, Africa.

We urgently need a Home School Program Coordinator at Bingham Academy. Would you let God use you here?

The school provides support for up to 40 children whose families work outside Addis Ababa and who are being educated in their homes. These off-campus students need resources, and their parents often need encouragement! You would have the experience of a lifetime contributing to a high quality God-centered education within a community rich in the mix of cultures and backgrounds. You would have a wonderful opening to teach them about Jesus and lay a foundation for future church leadership. As the Home School Program Coordinator, you will visit home schooling families down country, supervise a home school resource center at Bingham Academy, investigate audio-visual and computer based resources, and organize home school events for families participating in the Bingham Academy home school program.
